Facebook is a popular, free-access website. Users can join to connect and talk to other people. They can create profiles with personal information, add photos or lists of personal interests, send and get private or public messages, and join groups of friends. They can also add friends and update their personal profile to let their friends know new things about themselves. Only Facebook users who are 'real Facebook friends' can see a user's profile data.

Mark Zuckerberg founded Facebook while he was a student at Harvard University. At first only Harvard students could use the site, but later students from other colleges could join it, too. Later, any university student or high school student could use it and, finally, anyone aged 13 and over could join them.

Today the website has at least 140 million active users worldwide. It is free to users and makes money from advertising.
